

Briggs Gets the Klitschko Conking Call for October

Written by Phil Woolever

Tuesday, 17 August 2010 19:00

39 year old Klitschko, 40-2 (38), will be mocked for facing an unworthy challenger.

Meanwhile, long shot, almost off the radar Briggs, 51-5-1 (45), is in a comfortable duke out driving seat with a wide open autobahn before him. The road in Northern Germany is said to hold many cultural treasures. Briggs, 38, will get away with some, win or lose.

There's a lot more to it than that, as night in the surging global port of many calls called Hamburg will probably prove.

When Briggs announced from the WBC convention that he had a contract to meet Klitschko in October, it was hard to fathom that he had managed to ascend again to the threshold of what was once, and could be again, one of the most storied positions in global sport. Then Klitschko made the alphabet all-star party and didn't deny the story though he remained mum, probably due to negotiations. Still, the drop in proposed opposition from Nikolai Valuev to Briggs seemed like more than in just Valuev's height.

Then again, considering that the Klitschkos have pretty much swept the division of all reasonable and willing contenders and the present day, admittedly sparse landscape of leather gloved leviathans it isn't the worst opponent K2 could designate as their winter wonder. It's not unrealistic to see Briggs giving Valuev trouble, and not improbable that Briggs would have attacked Valuev more than a reluctant British big boy did.

Besides, at least Briggs wants to fight. We won't mention so called contenders who turned their backs when reasonable opportunities arose while there are doubtless many gallant B, C, and D level sluggos in gyms around the planet who would jump at the chance to throw in the stratosphere of a Klitschko fight.

Briggs may have gotten his latest gig simply by staying reasonably mobile and beating a few of the aforementioned journeyman types but give him credit for consistently talking his way into both a probably very decent paycheck in not the kindest of mauling markets, and a puncher's shot at another rainbow's end.

The big question: Can Briggs still have the power to land the kind of shot that splattered immediately former WBO topcat Sergi Liakhovich through the strands at the Arizona Diamondbacks ballpark before a disappointing crowd that witnessed a dull no-hitter until Briggs lit the place up with one of the wildest final second turnaround stoppages in boxing history? It would be an even better quiz if Briggs was facing Wladimir, the Klitschko brother with the perceived weaker chin.

Yes, Briggs probably still has the power, if judging from his arms, deltoids and back muscles means anything.

Briggs Gets the Klitschko Conking Call for October

Written by Phil Woolever

Tuesday, 17 August 2010 19:00

The bigger question: Will Briggs land such a shot?

That answer seems to be yes, if you listen to some prominent professional observers who declare the elder Klitschko brother seems to be slipping in terms of fitness and finesse. It is actually pretty reasonable to calculate that Briggs will land something heavy sometime, if not a clean shot, somewhere. Klitschko will also have to beware cheap but effective mind games of the type when Briggs accused Liakhovich of calling him n*r, then admitted it was a lie. Liakhovich was even more stunned from the racial BS than he was from Briggs punch.

Klitschko has been verbally abused by cruelly creative characters like Don King, James Toney, and David Haye. Briggs will have as much trouble psyching Klitschko out as he will walking him down.

I know Briggs is a big talker but hes also a big man in the ring, observed Klitschko at the initial press conference. Hes got a big punch and more fights on his record than me. I will be ready in my preparation.

Everybody that fights the Klitschkos (lately) has been scared to death. Im not scared, and Im putting pressure on him from the start, promised Briggs.

Have we heard that somewhere before?

The final conclusive clue query involves what will likely happen after Briggs lands a big bop.

Probably nothing much. Unless the landing frequency involves double figures.

A much faster, stronger Briggs couldnt dent George Foremans relatively ancient armor when Briggs captured a very questionable nod in the Grill tycoons happy swan song back in 1997. Few people are as durable as Big George, but Vitali Klitschko just might be. Briggs is no weakling, having a decently long run himself.

To me, Klitschko looked very solid in his last fight against Albert Sosnowski, a strong, willing but limited opponent who came to fight and dropped a respectable if uninspiring 10th round TKO. In a hypothetical Briggs - Sosnowski tussle, recent form says the Sos-man. Unless of course Briggs lands that big hambone.

Therein folks, lies the fights selling point.

Briggs will look good on the fight poster and in the video ads, and hell talk a good, perhaps too outrageous game. The O2 Arena will be packed with a fine fight crowd and other usually excellent entertainment. About half the TV sets within 1000 kilometers will tune in. Short of a 1st round Klitschko KO, the US press will lampoon the K-bros and the heavyweights.

Does Briggs have any chance of winning?

They call it a punchers chance.

Briggs Gets the Klitschko Conking Call for October

Written by Phil Woolever

Tuesday, 17 August 2010 19:00

In this case that chance is a lot slimmer than the meat on Mr. Briggs bicep.

The final question will be whether or not Klitschko will be able to stop Briggs without walking into an unpleasant dreamland himself.

That classic answer is the same as they said in a hotspot Hamburg back around the times of a heavyweight champion named Sonny Liston and some previously appearing hit makers named The Beatles.

Jah, jah, jah.