RIVERSIDE, CALIF.---Jonathan Arrellano rebounded from back-to-back losses and now looks dead ahead with the intensity and focus of a laser-guided crossbow.

What's the difference?

"My mentality has completely changed," said Arrellano. "I know boxing is a sport, but now my mentality is to destroy."

Arrellano (14-2-2, 3 Kos) has another tough challenge when he faces former WBA junior featherweight titlist Rico Ramos (22-3, 12 Kos) on Friday, Jan. 24, at Little Creek Casino Resort, in Shelton, Wash. ESPN2 will televise the featherweight clash.

It's not the first time the two Southern Californians have met in the boxing ring. Years ago, they met as amateurs.

"We fought as amateurs. I was 15 or 16 years old," said Arrellano, after training in the hillside gym in Riverside. "I beat him. Rico is quick but I think we've already seen the best of Rico."

Ramos showed in his last fight that even while falling far behind on the score cards he's capable of winning a fight by knockout. When he fought Carlos Velasquez and Akifumi Shimoda he was able to crack that wicked left hook to end the fight suddenly.

It doesn't worry Arrellano.

"I've never honestly been astounded with his power," said Arrellano, who has fought other power-wielding junior featherweights and featherweights. "When I go up against a great fighter I step up my game to that same caliber."

For all intents and purposes it's the most important prizefight of Arrellano's career.

"I see Rico as the world champion and nothing else," said Arrellano, whose trainer is Henry Ramirez, who also trains Chris "The Nightmare" Arreola among others. "Rico has a style that turns me into a dangerous fighter."

Josesito Lopez, the welterweight contender and stable mate of Arrellano, says that it's a winnable fight for his comrade.

"Jonathan has to beat him to the punch," said Lopez, who has several high profile fights in his resume. "He needs to be throw more punches than Rico."

In Arrellano's last bout he defeated another Southern Californian in Charles Huerta. It was a crossroads fight that would have spelled the end of the Ontario-based boxer had he lost. Instead, he's fighting Ramos on television in yet another crossroads battle.

"I've got to put smart pressure on him," Arrellano says.
