

Floyd Mayweather: Sucker Punch Or Valid?

It was the sucker punch heard and seen around the world.

Reaction came as swift and hard as the two-punch combination from Floyd Mayweather that laid WBC welterweight titleholder Victor Ortiz out cold for the count this past Saturday on the Golden Boy fight card in Las Vegas.

Prizefighters, trainers, commissioners and fans were quick to speak, scream and yell on whether or not Mayweather is a villain or hero.

During the press conference Ortiz hinted that the referee Joe Cortez, a man always involved in controversial endings, never truly called for the fight to resume. But Ortiz did acknowledge that he made a costly mistake.

“I learned a lesson,” said Ortiz, who was busy apologizing for intentionally head butting Mayweather on the mouth. He repeatedly hugged Mayweather who seemed to shrug it off and then proceed to wallop Ortiz with a left hook and right cross. Ortiz was looking at the referee who was looking somewhere off in space.

One person who found the knockout distasteful was Moreno Valley's Kaliesha West, a female world champion.

"Yes it is true, protect yourself at all times. But who wants to witness a cheap shot victory?" said West, the WBO bantamweight champ. "I would have preferred to see a fair-and-square victory. At the same time, I think Vic learned his lesson about being 'too nice' in that ring, especially after popping cheap shots. At the end of the night, they both made boxing look bad."

Another prizefighter, Brooklyn's Paul Malignaggi, was of the opposite opinion. The former junior welterweight world champion was incensed by the Ortiz head butts.

"I totally agree with Floyd. You cannot head butt a grown man intentionally all of those times and not expect him to get ticked off. Floyd reacted like any man would, he reacted angrily. I actually think he showed some self control because after that last head butt I would have flipped Victor over the top rope," said Malignaggi, who fights at the Staples Center on Oct. 15 against Mexico's Orlando Lora. "The rule is: protect yourself at all times. In a way I feel for Vic, but when I think about it, he also got what he deserved. If you fight like a punk you will be dealt like a punk, especially when in with a veteran like Floyd Mayweather."

Keith Kizer, the executive director for the Nevada State Athletic Commission, was walking back from the parking lot when we ran into each other after the fight.

"It was sad to see it end like that but there was nothing wrong according to the rules," said Kizer, who's dealt with controversies for many years as the head of the Commission. "Once the referee says to fight, then you have to protect yourself."

One boxing fan blames the entire debacle on referee Joe Cortez.

"What a travesty. That just wasn't right," said boxing fan Alfredo Esparza, who lives in the Pomona area. "Worst was the referee Joe Cortez. In every fight he referees something bad happens. He was looking at something else instead of the fight. Why does he always get the big fights? There must be a reason."

Boxing trainer Henry Ramirez, whose charge Josesito Lopez fought and lost by split decision on the same card, said it was one of those things that happens from time to time.

"Honestly, there was nothing wrong with it," Ramirez said. "The first thing they tell you in the dressing room is to protect yourself at all times."

It's not the first time an elite fighter was knocked out when not looking. Former junior featherweight world champion Israel "El Magnifico" Vazquez suffered the same fate as Ortiz back in 2002 for the same reason: he was looking at the referee with his hands down and Oscar Larios knocked him out. Three years later, Vazquez got his revenge with a three round butt whipping of Larios in Las Vegas to win the world title.

A rematch would be a good thing but somehow I don't see it happening.
