Hector Camacho Jr. Looks to Avenge Father's Loss to Saul Duran April 8

Next Friday night, April 8, in Atlanta, Middleweight boxer Hector Camacho Jr. will look to avenge his father's loss against Saul Duran. Hector "Macho" Camacho—a boxing legend with multiple championships—fought Duran at the tail end of his career last May and was defeated in 10 rounds, ending his incredible career with a record of 79-6-3.

This fight is not only about Camacho Jr. getting revenge and evening the playing field against Duran, but to also win to keep his hopes of getting another championship fight later this year.

"Of course I want to get out there and avenge my father's loss," said Camacho Jr. about fighting Duran. "But at the end of the day it is about getting the 'W' and working towards a title fight."

Last year Camacho Jr. fought David Lemieux for the WBC International middleweight title and was defeated. Since he has rebounded with a win over Juan Astorga, and looks to make an impact in his fight against Duran to make a bid for an upcoming title shot.

"Losing that championship fight in October really irks me, and I have been using it as motivation for getting ready for these upcoming fights," said Camacho Jr. "I need to continue to win, and if I can land a huge fight by September or October then I'll be right on point with my game plan."

Camacho Jr. is adamant about staying active in upcoming months in preparation for a possible championship fight.

"After the bout with Duran I want to line up at least two more fights between now and the summer, and keep working hard to get to the top."

When Camacho Jr. is not training he donates a large part of his time to working with inner city kids and is a Board Member for the nonprofit organization Find A Dream.

"I came from where a lot of these kids are coming from, and boxing was my way out," said Camacho Jr. "Find A Dream is doing a great thing working with youth in communities throughout America. When kids don't have a mentor or have direction, it is easy for them to stray of the path and get involved in drugs or gangs. But having an outlet like Find A Dream will help them stay on track and give them something to work for."

Camacho Jr. will go to battle with Saul Duran Friday, April 8 at the North Atlanta Trade Center in Norcross, Georgia.
