

Adrien Broner Could Surpass Floyd Mayweather

Written by Lee Wylie

Tuesday, 28 February 2012 09:38

A star is born.

Adrien Broner, 22, from Cincinnati Ohio, took his record to 23-0 [19 kos] this past weekend, with a scintillating fourth round knockout of tough Eloy Perez. Before the contest, many thought Perez possessed the style and attributes to give Broner a tough night's work. This however, did not prove to be the case as Broner, after taking just a fraction of the first round to figure out how his opponent was behaving, dominated the action in thoroughly one sided fashion. Perez appeared to be well out of his depth.

Adrien Broner Could Surpass Floyd Mayweather

Written by Lee Wylie

Tuesday, 28 February 2012 09:38

Broner, a natural counterpuncher, simply overwhelmed Perez in every area of the fight. Broner was patient early, taking in his smaller opponent's rhythm. Broner then set about disrupting that rhythm with a well timed jab, which he mixed well to body and head. Broner knew he had his man solved as he then started to walk Perez down, behind a high guard. Throwing jabs, straight right hands and lead left hooks, Perez was unable to adjust. One got the impression the fight was not going to last much longer as Broner began stalking his opponent with a lot more purpose and spite. The inevitable came after Broner landed a devastating straight right hand to the chin of Perez. Unable to beat the count, the fight was over.

It is hard not to get excited about Adrien Broner. He appears to have genuine pound for pound potential. At 22 years-old, to say the future looks bright is most definitely an understatement.

Now, something to think about. When a boxer has an admiration for another boxer, it can become evident in their own style, you will see little similarities evoking comparisons to other fighters whom they adore. It's apparent when watching Joe Frazier that he grew up idolizing Henry Armstrong. Likewise of Sugar Ray Leonard's obvious affection of Muhammad Ali. Sometimes, it can be a good thing. Frazier and Leonard both went on to become genuine stars of the sport in their own right. Sometimes, it can be a bad thing. Meldrick Taylor never quite escaped "the next Ray Leonard" moniker.

Within a few moments of watching Adrien Broner, it becomes apparent which fighter he holds a personal affection with. His over the top showmanship and brash behavior outside of the ring, along with his blend of defensive technique and athleticism inside it, have earned him quite a few comparisons to the man regarded as the finest pugilist alive today, Floyd Mayweather Jr.

On the surface, the comparison seems accurate. Broner, like Floyd is a ring technician of the highest order. They can fight effectively in close or at distance. Their offense occurs as a result of an emphasis on defense. Both have blinding handspeed. Both utilize the same defensive traits too. Standing side on with their feet wide apart, their right hands are always in perfect position over their chin and their left arms are always protecting their bodies. Their similarities don't end there. Broner is equally comfortable countering using his shoulder roll with his back against the ropes, or in the centre of the ring. His comfort and relaxation when under pressure is also reminiscent of Floyd's.

Here is my wish from now on though.

Rather than continue trying to be "the next Floyd Mayweather" Broner should focus his attention

Adrien Broner Could Surpass Floyd Mayweather

Written by Lee Wylie

Tuesday, 28 February 2012 09:38

on becoming "the first Adrien Broner" because he has some characteristics even Floyd does not possess.

If we think about Floyd Mayweather, his out of the ring persona is a direct result of something he is missing inside of the ring. The one area in which Floyd could improve on is his ability to finish a fight within the distance. In other words, Mayweather's skills are the show. Adrien Broner seems to be using his skills to close the show. The knockout is what attracts most casual fans to boxing. It is boxing's equivalent of a home run in baseball or a touchdown in football. Mike Tyson's intention and ability to end a fight made him arguably the most compelling in-ring fighter of all time, to hardcore and casual fans. Luckily for us, Broner seems to share some of Iron Mike's bad intentions.

Let's also remind ourselves that Broner is only 22. If we think about Floyd at that age, he was of a mover, utilizing more in the way of lateral movement and footwork. Back then, Floyd's game was more speed and reflex orientated. Broner's style is more like that of current Mayweather, pressing the attack, standing right in front of his opponent, combining defense and offense simultaneously before systematically breaking them down. Floyd Mayweather is 35 years old. His level of skill has been achieved because of over 15 years of ring experience. While Broner is clearly not quite on the same level as Mayweather, his understanding of feinting, timing and all round ring savvy shows ring maturity well beyond his years. Dare I say even more than Floyd did at the same age?

Broner's rare combination of defensive wisdom and genuine ko power are a very rare mix of talents indeed. Broner seems to have all the physicalities in his favour as well. He is taller than most of his opponents, he is faster than most of his opponents and he seems to hit harder than most of his opponents. Even at this early stage in his career, I'm convinced he could handle any junior lightweight in the world.

One thing is clear when watching Adrien Broner fight. We know how GOOD he is. Now, let's see how GREAT he can be.

Comment on this article

Radam G says:

Wow! This kid cannot yet clean his _____! Time will tell on him. As of now, he's a super

Adrien Broner Could Surpass Floyd Mayweather

Written by Lee Wylie

Tuesday, 28 February 2012 09:38

hype. Enough for now. Holla!

Yezsir says:

Broner's Knockout of Perez is crazy overrated. It was basically a cross jab, all arm, before the big shot, which was "BEHIND THE EAR". Plus the fact that the referee stop the count at 5 unjustly. Reminds me of Zab Judah being stopped prematurely against Kostya Tszyu. Sure they stumbled, but it was from trying to get up to soon. A mistake I think boxers do when they've never been down.

dino da vinci says:

Umm, no.

TotoyBato says:

His shorts have more tassels.

MisterLee says:

Nah man, if a man is that disoriented that he cannot stand up straight, the ref HAS to stop the fight. It's a health issue at that point. It's probably even in the rules. Zab Judah was done agst Kosta Tzsyu. Also, nah man, the "tassels" had more shorts than Floyd . hahaha... good comment!

Money Jay says:

I like Broner, but his whole style is based on Mayweather..It's like saying Kobe will be better than Jordan..NOT. Kobe got his whole style from Jordan..let Broner make his own name..He's going to have to move up in weight too, because there's nobody at 130lb for him..but the kid is a beast, and he will be a game changer..no doubt!

Whiteja202 says:

I disagree with the author's assessment of Mayweather and Broner in a couple of respects. Broner is not as athletically gifted as Mayweather. When Mayweather was 22 he was quicker, had better reflexes and was more powerful for his weight class. Broner isn't going to be able to hop around weight classes and dominate champions. Broner is more Bernard Hopkins than Roy Jones.

As he moves to 135 and 140 he will have to be a workaholic and even more of a master technician. And he will get hit a little more than Mayweather and have to have a good chin and will have to have awesome mental toughness to eak out wins against the top guys.

I do share the author's enthusiasm for Broner. I think he is beat anybody from 122 to 130 even now. Russel, Gamboa, Donair, mares should avoid Broner like the plague.

Adrien Broner Could Surpass Floyd Mayweather

Written by Lee Wylie

Tuesday, 28 February 2012 09:38
