The Belarusian-born Israeli Foreman, who has been living and training in Brooklyn since 1999, is studying to become a Rabbi in addition to competing as a professional boxer. Foreman won the WBA junior middleweight championship by pitching a dominant 12-round unanimous decision over Daniel Santos in November 2009. By winning the title, Foreman became the first Jewish world champion in 71 years, since Barney Ross lost his welterweight crown in 1938. In his first title defense, Foreman lost his junior middleweight belt in a spirited effort to Miguel Cotto in the inaugural boxing event held at the new Yankee Stadium in June 2010. Foreman badly injured his knee in the seventh round of their championship bout but continued to fight on. He was eventually stopped on his feet in the ninth round once his knee left him immobilized.

After the bout against Wolak, Foreman took some time out of the ring, but he has been training for the past few months feeling rejuvenated and ready to make another run at a world championship.

Wow! Yuri, the rabbi is gonna blow that trumpet again. Maybe the walls of Jericho are coming down again. Wow! I gotta check fact. A ton of guys winning title belts have claimed to be Jewish since Barney Ross. Two that comes to mind are Zab Judah and Saul Mamby. I guess it is all about what sect of Judaism?

One thing is certain, religions -- just as PEDs and roid -- don't win fights, skills, talent, hard work, robberies, fixes and pugilistic in shape and politics do. Holla!

Radam G says:

BTW! YUP! Rabbi Yuri Foreman was not the first Jewish boxing champion in 71 years after the late, great Barney [The Super Bad Boss] Ross. Jewish Mike Rossman [al Piano] won a WBA belt in 1978. Sorry Yuri. That is the way a rhetorical punch can drop "Da REAL THANG, BABEEEE! Holla!

Bernie Campbell says:
